

Keep Newfoundland and Labrador frack-free

Some year ago, visiting Newfoundland, we were awed by the beauty of the Western Brook Pond and of the Gros Morne Natl.Park, therefore I can't believe that gaining a bit of oil at such a price: unsustainable amount of water needed, no safe method of disposing waste water, increased dangers of transporting such highly volatile material, is reasonable. All these reasons would apply to Labrador and and the other provinces as well. The same amount of $$ would be better used developing other sources of energy and leave that oil in the ground and save this landscape from a destruction like the tar-sands in Alberta.

Surely, if we can get to the moon and even further, we can develop a less destructive method of creating energy.
